Not illustrated. 1894 Excerpt: .may use our liberty as a cloak for sin, and not, as it is intended to be, a garment of royal prerogative. The day set apart for our good ought surely to be made the best and brightest of the seven. To do this, it must be planned for carefully. The father s business and the mother s household work must be so arranged as to give time to the children. Put the house in order, so that there shall be a bright Sunday-look about everything. Search out through the week some good and entertaining books for the older ones to read, and picture-books for the little ones. Make a distinction between the reading and the plays (for children must play) on Sundays and week-days. In a certain home, not imaginary but real, in which the day is truly a delight, for each child there is a special set of Sunday toys, books, dolls, --every one a little brighter and better than the week-day article. The Sunday dinner is not a feast burdensome-to prepare, but it always has some pleasant surprise in a favorite article of food. The hours round the Sunday evening lamp, with books, papers, and music, and the big illustrated Bible read and explained, will never be forgotten by the members of that household; for of all the memories which crowd the chambers of the brain, none hold such lasting influence over us as those linked with our childhood. They form the background...
